"STRKE HARD, O ISLAM" (Vide Mr. Ollier's sonnet in Public Opinion, May 12th. Strike hard, O Moslem blade, for new too long Thou hast made lies thy refuge, -let thy might Now viadicate to all the world thy right, Thy sacred heaven-sent right, "to govern wrong."

Islam strike hard, for grovelling in the dust Are stretched thy myriad vassals at thy foot; And wouldst thou lose a heritage so sweet, A field for boundless murder, pillage, lust?

The time demands thou strain thy every nerve For on thine arm weighs many a dying prayer (Breathed, too, by those who still thy thraldom boar) Therefore strike hard, nor from thy purpose swerve.

Albion is poaceful gain is all her care, Therefore, that war be brief and peace hold sway. And thou once more mayst seize thy lawful prey. Strike hard, O Islam !-it is Albien's prayer.

MADAME DE SEVIGNE. As far as mere fame goes, we do not know (says the Saturday Review) that the genius of woman has anything to hope for that shall equal the glorification which her countrymen lavish on Madame de Sévigné Will the chefs-d'œuvre of George Sand or George Eliot be hereafter celebrated wit the honours that have been showered for two hundred years on the flowing pen of the first of letter-writers? Will the Fellows the Institutes of 2077-be collating their manuscripts, comparing editions, diving into obscurities, annotating, dating, detecting interpolations, treating them as authorities on the niceties and graces of language? Wil classical works of their respective countries? noms de plume, aims at too close a fellowship with men's genius for any such homage. For the fame of Mdme, de Sevigne is homage.

That intimate companionship to which her brilliant style admits us with what is most charming and enlivening in feminine society Mademoiselle Dosne, and in which, like a prompts to praise as an act of gallantry. It is companionship with a woman gifted with all the charms and graces of her sex, who sees every thing with a woman's eyes, who never no ideas on woman's mission, who treats what are called frivolities as serious things, who acquiesces blindly in the fact of man's supremacy—all the while thinking her own thoughts, clear in her own opinions, and taking her own way. We see her wise, practical, and vigorous, loving, tender, and constant, cheerful and playful, all in woman's fashion her protty head never too heavily weighted with thought for her graceful shoulders. It is this essentially feminine quality that delights the editor of the newly-discovered fruits of her prolific pen. It is because she was not a Pascal that he has found that "le genie plein de grâce de Marie de Rabutin ne méritait pas moins de zèle que l'austère génie de l'auteur des Pensces." The mixed feelings with which Frenchmen

Gambetta has called him a serpent in spectacles; but now the two are old Place behind Notre Dame de Lorette in friends. Some of the French papers refer to him as the great statesman, the illustrious veteran, the saviour of the country; while others-and these not the ultra-democratic organs-describe him as a great man whose carreer has been a curse to France. He has not passed a single law; his name is not identified with one measure of rirogress : he is a protectionist of the most old-fashioned type and did harm to commerce while President by reversing some of the Free Trade policy of the Empire. He was the opponent of railways; he is no friend to England, and nearly involved the two countries in war under Louis Philippe.
